

Georgians like the performance of the church according to a new poll

Georgians like the performance of the church according to a new poll by the National Democratic Institute.

When it came to the performance of institutions, the Georgian Orthodox Church topped the list with a 61% positive assessment. Only 7% said it had performed badly while 21% evaluated it as average.

In addition, 62% of Georgians thought religion united people as a society, while 29% disagreed.

According to the survey, Georgians also said the Church should have an influence on political decision-making — 46% were in favour while only 39% disagreed.
